

HEADS,
EMPLOYMENT
LITIGATION
PREVENTION & DEFENSE

David Kurtz
Boston, MA
New York, NY

Sarah Robertson
San Francisco, CA

EDITOR IN CHIEF

Robin Shea
Winston-Salem, NC

Susan Bassford Wilson
St. Louis, MO

Protests amid a pandemic: Part Deux You think you've got this? Think again.

By Frank Shuter
Atlanta Office

As we have reported, a state court judge in California recently issued a Temporary Restraining Order prohibiting the reopening of a business until the employer complied with nearly one dozen COVID-19 safety-related requirements. The allegations of the public nuisance lawsuit leading to that TRO were egregious and, if true, reflected a conscious disregard for the health and safety of employees. For example, the lawsuit alleged that the employer failed to inform employees that they had been exposed to COVID-19, and failed to implement social distancing or cleaning protocols.

But, that's not you. You've provided information to employees. You've implemented safety protocols. You're covered. Well, think again.

We also reported on a judge in Illinois, who ordered an employer to do more to protect its employees from contracting COVID-19. The judge specifically noted that the employer had "the right idea," and had implemented safety protocols designed to protect workers, like providing and requiring the use of protective gear and washing stations. But, according to the judge, more needed to be done because "the procedures [implemented by the employer]... are not working [and the employees'] right to work free from exposure to a highly contagious and deadly disease is being substantially and unreasonably interfered with." As a result, the judge ordered the employer to strictly enforce its mask policy and retrain employees on proper social distancing and cleaning requirements.

These two cases, half a country apart, highlight two critical lessons that every employer trying to navigate its way through this crisis needs to learn. First, trying to do the right thing matters. Second -- and this lesson cuts across everything we do in the world of employment litigation -- an employer is no better than its lowest level managers. How those front-line managers supervise employees, and implement company policies, governs the way that their employers will be viewed by both judge and jury. Implementing well-crafted, legally compliant policies and procedures is a required starting point. It reflects "the right idea" and may well provide protection from claims of willful and reckless disregard for the safety of employees.

But unless front-line managers implement and enforce those policies and procedures, exposure (to both the disease and large jury verdicts) still exists. Requiring the use of masks, and social distancing between employees, are best practices. But they are of little value unless enforced, and ensuring

June 30, 2020

Legal Bulletin #803

This is a publication of Constangy, Brooks, Smith & Prophete, LLP. The information contained in this newsletter is not intended to be, nor does it constitute, legal advice. The hiring of a lawyer is an important decision that should not be based solely upon advertisements. Before you decide, ask us to send you free written information about our qualifications and experience. No representation is made that the quality of the legal services to be performed is greater than the quality of legal services performed by other lawyers. This email could be considered advertising under applicable laws.

IRS Circular 230 Notice: Federal regulations apply to written communications (including emails) regarding federal tax matters between our firm and our clients. Pursuant to these federal regulations, we inform you that any U.S. federal tax advice in this communication (including any attachments) is not intended or written to be used, and cannot be used, by the addressee or any other person or entity for the purpose of avoiding penalties that may be imposed under the Internal Revenue Code.

www.constangy.com
Toll free 866.843.9555

such enforcement requires vigilance, regular follow-up, and regular training.

As we work our way through this national crisis, the federal government (and various state governments) may provide immunity to employers with respect to certain COVID-19-related legal claims. Don't hold your breath waiting for that to happen. And even if it does, any legislation will probably exclude claims based on conduct reflecting a willful, wanton, or reckless indifference to the safety of employees. In the past several months, multiple lawsuits have been filed against employers, all of which seek to skirt the workers' compensation system and win substantial damages from employers, based on such alleged conduct.

Doing the right thing, by implementing appropriate COVID-19 safety protocols, is a crucial first step. But you can't stop there. Front-line managers must be trained on those protocols. Diligent follow-up on that training is required. Enforcement of the protocols is crucial. Having a mask policy is meaningless unless front-line managers correct employee failures and, if necessary, discipline employees for failing to comply. So, you think you've got this? Think again.

Need help with reopening?
Check out our Coronavirus Return to Work FAQs for the latest guidance. And more general information is available on our Coronavirus Resource Center page.

Constangy, Brooks, Smith & Prophete, LLP

Constangy, Brooks, Smith & Prophete offers a wider lens on workplace law. We have counseled employers exclusively since 1946. With offices in 15 states, we are one of the largest labor and employment law practices in the U.S. Constangy has been named as a top firm for women and minorities by organizations including Law360, the National Law Journal and Vault.com. Many of our more than 190 attorneys have been recognized by leading authorities such as Chambers & Partners, Best Lawyers in America® and Martindale Hubbell. Find out more about us online at www.constangy.com or follow us on Twitter @ConstangyLaw.

Office Locations

Alabama, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Florida, Georgia, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Missouri, New Jersey, New York, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, and Virginia.